the disadvantages of a service which, nevertheless, the author preferred to service under

The author went again to sea in 1823, and in 1825; when he had served twenty-one years, he became a captain. In 1637 he embarked on board the Wellesley, which revried the flag of the Commander-in-Chief of the Hast Indies. In this ship he accompanied the armament which made war in China in 1841, and throughout that year his served principally on shore, to the full entisfaction of his General, Sir Hugh Gough. The greatest danger of each a war urises from the unhealthy climate. In March he writes that he was very unwell, suffering from diarrhee and the Bank of Hinduistan, China, and Japan. The Gr was not sufficiently recovered to attend them.
In May he banded in command of a buttalion of murines, forming part of the force destined to attack Canton. He was under the great disadvantage of having to form the battalion as the men landed, many of them meeting for the first time. This disadvantage is inherent in the constitution of the force, and it is highly honourrines on shore may compare with those of the army. The storming of Canton was obviated feet.

by payment of a ransom. The author's service Annual Ground Rent £12. 12s. 6d. was rewarded by a gratifying letter from Sir Hugh Gough, and a very complimentary brigade order. Those testimonials were the more creditable because they were carned under disability from sickness. A little later he writes that three of his officers and himself were on the sick-list, and that fully half of the force which had been before Canton was unfit for service. In attempting to cross from Macao to Hongkong in a small trader, he narrowly escaped. shipwreek in a typhoon. "Such was the force and fury of the gale, that the Hebs, with two anchors down, was fast drifting on a rocky island to lesward," But he escaped, to receive for his services at Cauton the moderate reward of a majority, and to read in the London Gazette a despatch from the Commodore on the station which reminded the Admiralty that "this meritorious old officer was in Sir Robert Colder's action, at Trafalgar, in the Potomic, and in nury other very brilliant affairs." The despatch Mesers. MARGESSON & Co. expressed the Commodore's thanks and admiration for the order which he established in the battalion, and the gallantry with which heled the advance of the force. The quiet love of the author for hard fighting is excellently expressed TO SHIPWRIGHTS, TIMBER, AND COAL in a passage of his journal of later date, where he says that, as little impression could be made snot on an almost impenetrable fortified work, " Captain Bouchier most kindly and considerately yielded to my suggestion to let me land with my detachment and drive the Chinese from their position."
